

FREE DEATH IN AMERICA!

"Just because you don't take an interest in politics doesn't mean politics won't make it's interest in you." -Pericles, originator of formal democracy

"I beseech you, in the bowels of Christ, think it possible you may be mistaken." -O. Cromwell

As a Westerner, you might have a mind boggling experience trying to read and comprehend these things. Both your inner- and outer-worlds have been so highly conditioned that despite your unknowing belief in the concept of human autonomy, external ideas could be devastating. That is to say, truly novel ideas are those herein, likely to disturb the ontological makeup that you consider the self, as well as those understandings of ways which you consider the world outside of your mind's comprehension to be.

Unfortunately the whole world has "westernized", don't you feel safe and sound. Nevertheless, simply try to understand. Believe it or not, there is a world beyond YOU and all of the ways of the psuedo-culture you have experienced. There is a world beyond money and so-called "work" where you just try to navigate the best you can for your own bank account. A world beyond barbecues, movies, sports, revelry, alcohol and other material consumption.

There is a world of deep meaning and spirituality that transcends the nuance of daily life. A world with eternal romance and bonds that cannot be broken. You might not know about this since you think it's great to live in a world where your money allows simple comforts or where you can say "I do" and then "I don't" with a quick phone call to any divorce lawyer from a google search. It's just a small expense for modern life, right? Money: the replacement for everything that once was sacred. Then comes money's awkward, annoying, and inescapable cousin "the law", who never misses a family outing. The law doesn't just invade our lives when we commit "crimes" (as people we don't even know get to define it), or when our parents die and we fight with our siblings over property. It moves the world around us. It's a machine, employed and given credence through the concept of jurisdiction and land regulation by a government policy that is incredibly authoritarian considering how humanity, an otherwise natural entity, is now confined and directed in even the tiniest minutiae. Have dating or marital troubles? Perhaps its due to lack of clarity from the law—it attempts and fails every time to be a mediator in the eternal war of the sexes. That's all the narratives that employ institutional psychology do, is enforce authoritarian perspectives over a geography that violates human's natural grouping and maneuvering spiritual tactics...enforce perspectives on others.

Just read about how the law protects intimate deceivers through a simple Google search. The plethora of society's dystopian traits that the law only serves to exacerbate is endless. Then there's lawyers, agents of soul-thieving metaphysical creations. While many lawyers suffer psychologically if they have any sense of morality, the money-driven ones enjoy quite a blissful, intellectually stimulated existence. Particularly troubling is how the sum of the players in the framing of legality in our society manifests our world into a 1984ish dystopia on steroids. While most people don't care about surveillance capitalism, or even have a clue what the hell it is, it's all too real and affects far more than just illicit drug traffickers. How did all these cameras and web monitoring come into existence? Aside from Kindergarten "buddy systems" between mid-range-IQ politicians and corporate lobbyists (from big box stores to tech manufacturers), few people understand the significance of the biblical passage about Caesar's decree that "all men are to be registered". If it was about a greedy monarch wanting money, most of the world could wrap their little brains around it and grasp it. Unfortunately, taxation was NOT the reason, just the excuse! A great excuse, mind you . . . the ability to collect money from every citizen with an even more devious plan under that surface: total control. He wanted to know every single person under his rule for purposes of order and monitoring, and his wish has been a key component of every government since. What a welcome to new living organisms that ought to be considered to possess souls! Welcome to Earth, we are watching you! What used to be God's job, mankind has instituted on all of the others. These powers—that have taken many generations to manifest—are so deep that individually we are all helpless, but it's funny because they end up just demeaning their own implementation by making our lives so meaningless and not free . . . predetermined. The worst part about it all is how individualistic it all is. Perhaps the system they built decided it would be best to keep everybody separated, a sort of technocratic twist on divide and conquer, with the illusion of individuality serving as a sedative. Between computer systems, identity controls (all of our roles are hardly different than under elitist rule aside from different titles), cameras and other surveillance (even something they consider when doing city planning), with facial recognition and databases big enough to keep track of more factors than anyone on this planet would be able to live an existence without being utterly monitored for anything resembling crime according the evolving "code", it was programmed according to a certain metaphysical form: ideas about reality and time, society, and the quest to dominate it all. The creation of AI, for example, along with it's accompanying heuristic models, begin in the minds of people: the "Miles Dyson's of the world" –there's too many out there in reality to count and they are ruining all of our futures! / Institutions that effectuate this abstraction we call law such as Thompson-Reuters can make all the money they want and manipulate the entire workforce and regulate every last drop of property and human behavior down to the legality of chemical analysis of urine in public urinals and using facial recognition to immediately arrest chemical offenders like the world rationalized techno-puritanism.

If they want to require lawyers to acknowledge their "unconscious bias" I call bullshit and suggest they have gone way too far by getting into mind control. It is NOT okay what this hugely populated world is doing to it's people and the list is growing every day. The way that regulation has gotten and what the law has permitted is beyond atrocious, failing to understand the realities of the human condition. Though it is arguably an equal part of the sociological phenomena that is the rise of bureaucratic social institutions in post-modernity, something seems afoot that makes it all less than natural and in no way innocent. Certainly there are actors well aware of their aims as power-hungry, money hungry, and general duplicity toward the whole of humanity. Particularly problematic is how the fate of the world depends upon the everyday actions of these individuals . . . all individuals, but ones with the power to determine the direction of global machines like the implementation of law and order, coupled with creation of AI (more aptly titled AE, augmented egos). While we've all been familiarized with corporate hierarchy and the madness and folly of climbing it or complacency, this creation isn't one anybody can escape. It isn't limited to the ambiguously named and discreetly placed and styled buildings wherein its agents drone away at manipulating the whole world. /It's everywhere, in everything. It decides that people in Brazil need cellular technology so they can be conformed and controlled while their resources are extracted. It decides to make certain behaviors illegal . . . and when and how to penalize or ensure conformity. It places people with opposing ideologies in the same work place and demands no conflict. It forces people to work for money, and then creates inflation by printing as much as it needs. It is the perfect shade of gray . . . the fluctuating shade that depends on the time of day and lighting in the room.

This, however, is not an anarchist manifesto, though things have gotten awfully twisted if opposition to a severely domineering techno-monotonous culture is somehow anarchist. This is a call for a simple, measly understanding of the senselessness of the above-world's pacification and regulation of all life, it's depersonalization of meaning, and it's contribution to disenchantment and enslavement of everyone into drudgery for a life they usually don't even want. Employing methods of logical reasoning is a trap, the system loves such engagement, but whatever. Through conceptualizations of things only people with real souls might find joy in, perhaps it is possible to reach an audience from the other side. Why? Well, more than anything, with life completely ruined, this is a plea to not interfere with death! Catacombs. Would American law permit such musings even if it was consensual by its contributors? NO. How do I know this? Because I know this culture. Boring, rigid, bureaucratic, self-righteous, authoritarian, de-spiritual and delusional about its fixed version of reality. Now in the face of widespread death, the duality of the people is caught between maintaining economics, the fixed monetary system, and sustaining its citizenry as willing constituents. THEY DON'T KNOW HOW TO HANDLE DEATH. I learned the significance of this long ago, only to be shunned from the world.

Despite the significance of death rites of every religious tradition to ever exist, the law can abridge and deny burial rights with a compelling interest, such as the three fucks rule. For those of you who are familiar with "not giving two fucks", the three fucks rule is the law trumping everything without sound reasoning even though reason is supposedly the aim of law . . . but a judge has authority and if something is bizarre according to cultural standards, it will not carry weight, regardless of American laws claims of respecting religion and individual rights. Simply put, the same people who will run our lives, our worlds, our systems, and regulate every drop of land use, property use, resource use, will also regulate our death! We don't actually have real burial rights, nor do our families have ultimate control over the bodies of their deceased, nor do we have religious rights when they cross the established legal order of America. With hundreds of millions people dying and limited land, burial will be out of the question. The same humanity that stole all the world from nature will not even allow its subjects to return to it. The wealthy will be able to surpass this.

"You are to enjoy life, and in your old age, when senility sets in, you will be transported out of sight of the beauty of family life where the inevitable and natural process of transition of power moves from elders to middle-agers seamlessly (without elderly interference). You will be visited on occasion and die respectfully—in private—and soon enough be forgotten." The law might as well be stealing the whole world's religiosity! The laws treatment of death begins in mere anticipation of death, with many courses of action from estate and funeral planning, to keeping such a rigid outlook on economics and social norms that elders must be assigned to new living quarters because there's no time and place for the working aged to take them on as a burden. FAMILIES CANT EVEN KEEP THE BODIES OF THEIR DECEASED BECAUSE THE STATE MANDATES THAT THEY BE TAKEN!!!!!!!!! I say 'fuck that' times a number that infinity masterbates to.

Thousands of years and infinite cultures, and NONE, NOT ONE has treated the final phase of life this way. Economic reality certainly makes elderly care a burden. It's a tragic reality that the monetary systems the domineering humans have employed creates such vast differences in the dignity of death—fuck impoverished lives, what about impoverished spirits at death!—but am I wrong for romanticizing aging as a form of wisdom? Just because American middle-aged persons view elderly as delusional doesn't mean they're right. The time to reflect on imminent death and a lifetime of experience with work, money, society, religion, spirituality, and anything else imaginable likely makes the elderly choose their words far wiser, with more care and concern for the future of their offspring than any of the people who write them off can comprehend!

Cultures—real cultures, not a de-emotionalized pre-planned life course society, but real cultures—such as medieval Ireland had significantly more wondrous, heartfelt, and humane approaches to death and the aging process. Paganesque life phases such as the Mother Maiden Crone are somewhat mystic, but in the drury materialism view are written off as ancient and bizarre, unintelligent. The Egyptians perhaps went a bit far, by their extremes of classism and utter devotion of the livelihood of the masses to the divine spiritual deaths of a tiny elite (Pharaohs) on the basis of reincarnation, but it was also a culture deeply dependent on monarchical social structure for survival.

Anti-democratic? Perhaps. But, HAVE YOU SEEN HOW IMPOSSIBLE DEMOCRACY IS!!! It wasn't about evil authoritarianism, it was about sharing the beauty of life together, and everyone involved embracing the madness and folly of human civilization! Something we've lost. Tragic. /Society on the whole is worried about death. While hiding it from reality, they simultaneous devote immense time and energy to creating systems to fight it . . . often to the point we don't even enjoy life. If freedom is the aim, begin with death rites, an area that our "culture" is highly divided. Perhaps something seemingly as insane as devoting uniform efforts to preserving the rights of the dead, invocation of their spirits, would be the one thing that could end racism as the idiotic world we live in continues to struggle with it. Newsflash: Malcom X and the founder of the American Neo-Nazi party agreed on interracial breeding (that it should be avoided / disallowed). Years later, these two extremists both had changed their views. Though I'm unsure of the specifics, I think they viewed it as an inevitable process since population growth in a world confined by limited space and the sharing of human activity and cultures would lead to growth of relationships and dynamics that would change and evolve as all human life and emotion inevitably does. While this isn't even my main or most significant reason for highlighting the insane approaches to preservation of life, I want to make clear that I don't deny the efforts of the medical field to their socratic oaths nor to the ventures of American corporate magnates to development of life-preserving/enhancing systems, such as the development of ICDs or pacemakers, but as human realities, they are limited efforts to some degree. The preservation of massive amounts of life unfortunately also creates resource and environmental issues.

Death is a part of life, and its something I strongly desire to share with my fellow man in a cultural sense . . . more openly and honestly than this entire nation even allows me to. Since our culture delegates our demise and its meaning to governmental authoritarian figures, do we really even have a culture? Death is one of the most significant aspects of any and all religiosity. Now, they've taken that too! They control our monetary system, the work we must do in order to survive, lied and made to feel like it's an individual's choice merely because we're given a selection of limited options. I mean, what the fuck, this economy and lifestyle is destroying the planet at the same time it's increasing our quality of life. They use money and logistics to the Nth degree, but with population issues, difficulty of predicting the future, changing the nature of resource allocation and property use and the laws accompanying them, its gonna BUST! Aside from complete social breakdown, they will have a hard time keeping humanity even existing when their megalopolis decomposts. It's because the system they've built has been on flawed foundations, the metaphysics of which lack the type of fluidity that REAL humanity possesses inside, a mystery which no amount of property valuation/appraisal, securities rules and regs, macro-level financial rules like quantitative easing can comprehend. You see, money has lost its innocence, and its mystique...just ask one of the most well-renowned experts of all time Mervyn King who agrees wholly that big government banking systems run on a hefty sum of alchemy. So what if economists would beg to differ, they're only concerned because if everybody abandons money they will be the first ones whose life's work is rendered obsolete because they chose to place it into numerical form in a savings account. It will happen. Then they can call me for liberation and we can work together to find new meaning and put their tremendous intelligence to real work. /Aside from that aspect of the economics, how about the fact that estate planning, funeral costs (let the professionals handle the death of your parent—its all about tha benjamins, straight cash homeyz, money, paper, dinero, skrilla, moola, dead prezzyz). Even burial, having been one of the most fundamental traditions in various religious approaches to treatment of the body at death, as more than symbolic, is in jeopardy. How in the world in a culture that already has stressed zoning laws and land use policies are we going to deal with hundreds of millions of people dying and wanting to be buried?

The answer that society will give: money. It's the Western's world answer to EVERYTHING. SO what, the rich can afford burial? Whoaaa, maybe those ancient Egyptians aren't so different after all. The truth is that the expense will simply go up significantly, and more and more efforts of business in cremation will splurge. The type of shit that makes me want to die on a space shuttle away from this Earth and humanity altogether . . . they ruin my life AND death! Only the rich can have their ashes let go in space. Thanks a lot fellow humans, denying me of everything sacred I've ever felt. Lifelong love and monogamy: "get over it." Meanwhile, you go have your sexual affairs and demean the importance of your so-called love with insignificant others. Let me explain something you don't know about death, spirituality, magick, and even your own Christianity or atheism. Life and earthly occurrences ARE incomprehensible by any individual human being, regardless of how far science comes, regardless of the meaning we attach to things or our subjective experiences. Even atheists, secularists, scientists, or any other approach to the world that might fall under scientific materialism and seeming logic cannot hardly touch the surface of how human linguistics, emotions, clashing of cultures and ideals, nor fully understand nevermind manage in a way that is often the aim of vast human scientific movements such as the human genome project, disease research, or even the most disturbing modern movement toward cultural and psychological manipulation. Separate selves? Or just citizens of a government that gives them that much leniency? When times get bleak, it is up to the government to decide what approach it will take, and their authority will generally be followed. Although, I suspect something a bit more bizarre might be of significance. What of the possibility of a plea to the people to understand another form of their own nature? Sort of like how the tiniest cigarette ash can burn down an entire forest, I suppose a particular idea, properly constructed and entered into the stream of consciousness in the right manner, could act as a catalyst to completely alter the thoughts of everyone, whether because it is disturbing or demented, but it was nonetheless utterly disruptive to social discourse and effectively destroy society as anyone had ever known it. They take enchanted reality away by convincing people before they can ever find out anything to the contrary that these ancient cultures were ridiculous, and the new methods are significantly more reasonable and positive.

What if positivism was just a way to keep people binary and stupid, so that they can be controlled, an in with little switches. What is originally we were all so ridiculously enlightened it was like being high all the time and so the people were so creative and intelligent that in today's terms it would be like having God-like powers...Imagine if a human being really could just, with their hands and will, and understanding of all things, part an ocean to it's floor so they can pass through safely...and shipbuilding was a digression. The "system" only serves those crafty enough to navigate it and what's worse is how many more there are like that who simply haven't cracked the code. Thusly, I suggest moving toward a completely different perspective as immediately as the minds of the people of this era can handle. Let this be a final reminder that I would find it fulfilling to share in the building of catacombs or other ritualistic death-focused task that can serve as a mystery for future humans if there are any. Anything but partake in this mass-atrocity. I'd like a private ossuary of the one person I've loved more than anyone or anything else in this world...a love greater than any love any human on this earth has ever felt. You destroyed my relationship with the one I love. You presume death to be unpredictable, but its not in many cases. She will die soon, long before her time...but you will steal all this from me too. At least let me die my own way and take my name off your records.
